ABSTRACT

Indian agriculturere has developed immensely after the infusion of innovative research and technological advancements. It has seen the light of day, but still ignores the himalyan role that women play in this particular sector. A huge section of women workers are involved in agriculture but are not duly recognised for their work. There is a gap between what people perceive and what women actualt contribute. It is imperative to notice that broad based goals and national interest can be acheived by involving women in this important sector of India. This paper emphasizes the role of women in agriculture and how to increase their maximum contribution. The gender gap that hampers the productivity can be minimised by creating opportunities for women and recognising their role and importance.
